

Part of the allure of air travel is that not only are you physically detached from the ever busy life on the ground, but that you can also mentally remove oneself from it as well. Whether on business or pleasure travel, this type of setting is a cherished escape in our times. Other than being the POTUS, I do not see the true practical need for anyone to be "connected" at all times. In fact, such connectivity would create a much less relaxing environment where one does not have the choice from which to be removed. If such communications were allowed, my air travel experience would suffer and I would actively seek out those airlines, if possible, that did not allow in flight cellular communications and only select them for my travel needs. Please consider this point-of-view in your decision concerning this matter.